HORMUZ COUNTERS

Closure

Day 196 (straits.live, as of 9/13 1017Z) — arithmetically level with globalsecurity.org's Day 196 cited 9/11, but only because that tracker hasn't republished since; not an actual reconciliation of the two counting methods.

Transits

Kpler's most recent dated figure is unchanged from Saturday: 7 vessels on 9/10 vs. a 10-day avg. of 15; no fresher Kpler print located this run. straits.live separately cites 6 vessels on 9/6 as 7% of an 85/day pre-crisis baseline — a different date and frame, not netted against Kpler's.

Dark tankers/AIS

A third straits.live metric, distinct from both Kpler's transit count and Saturday's "stranded vessel" figure: 84 vessels lost AIS signal in the past 24h of 207 screened, vs. a 7-day avg. of 49.9. [Saturday's 490-total stranded-vessel figure wasn't relocated this run for comparison — no day-over-day read offered]

War-risk premia

Unchanged ~$10.0M/VLCC (~40x peacetime, straits.live) — page timestamp now reads "set 26 days ago," a day further stale than Saturday.

Strikes (24-48h)

An Iranian commercial vessel was hit by an unidentified projectile off Qeshm Island early Sunday, 1 dead/4 wounded of a 10-person crew (IRNA, via Qeshm's governor, who blamed a "terrorist enemy") [NEW — see Lead]. Separately, per Bahrain's Foreign Ministry: the East-West pipeline in Saudi Arabia was attacked this week and an ammonia tank in Bahrain was struck, "nearly" causing what the ministry called a "widespread catastrophe" — sharper detail than Saturday's generic "Saudi Arabia shut a bypass pipeline" note, not a new event.

Kpler's AIS daily/10-day averages, straits.live's day-specific, AIS-loss, and stranded-vessel snapshots, and Lloyd's List's weekly aggregation measure different populations over different windows — never netted or averaged.

LEAD

A SUNDAY STRIKE, A MONDAY SIGNING, AND ONE GULF STATE SITTING IT OUT

Hours after an Iranian ship was hit off Qeshm, Oman prepares to sign a Hormuz shipping accord Monday — without Bahrain

Early Sunday, an Iranian commercial vessel was struck by an unidentified projectile off Qeshm Island, roughly 14 miles from Bandar Abbas. One of the ship's ten crew members was killed and four were wounded. [fact] IRNA, citing Qeshm's governor, said the type of projectile had not been determined and blamed a "terrorist enemy," stopping short of naming Israel or the US directly. [fact] No group had claimed the strike as of this writing. [flag: unclaimed]

The episode lands less than 24 hours before the most concrete step yet toward de-escalating the broader Hormuz crisis. Iranian, Gulf Cooperation Council, and Iraqi foreign ministers are due to meet Monday in Salalah, Oman, where — per Iranian President Masoud Pezeshkian's own description of the agenda — they are set to sign an accord establishing a joint Oman-Iran shipping route through the strait and notify the International Maritime Organization of it. [fact] It would be the first senior diplomatic gathering of Gulf states and Iran since the US-Israeli campaign against Iran began Feb. 28. [fact]

One of the seven invitees won't be there. Bahrain's Foreign Ministry said Saturday it will not join any collective meeting involving Iran until diplomatic relations — severed in 2016 in step with Saudi Arabia, which restored its own ties in 2023 — are restored, and separately cited this week's attack on Saudi Arabia's East-West pipeline and a strike on an ammonia tank in Bahrain that it said "nearly resulted in a widespread catastrophe," arguing regional security "cannot be built by overlooking attacks, nor secured by remaining silent about their consequences, or through a policy of appeasement." [fact, direct quote] Manama said it had relayed its position to Oman through official channels and still backs the diplomatic effort in principle. [fact]

This is the same signal that moved Friday's oil market when it was still just a report of a meeting: Brent's 2.8% drop and WTI's 2.4% drop both came on reports that a Gulf-Iran shipping conversation was coming, days before it had a venue, a text, or an attendee list attached to it. [read, carries forward Friday's Lead] Monday's Globex reopen is the first real test of whether an actual signing — of a narrow deal covering one Oman-Iran corridor, not a full strait reopening, and one Iran has separately claimed would still exclude US and Israeli vessels (per an Aug. 7 report, uncorroborated elsewhere) — is a bigger or smaller de-escalation than the rumor that already moved the market. [read] It also lands two days ahead of Wednesday's FOMC decision, where hike odds near 85-91% on CME FedWatch have been driven in large part by this same oil-led inflation scare; a market that reads Monday's signing as genuine de-escalation, even a partial one, would leave the Fed deciding Wednesday on an inflation impulse that's already started to look stale

by the time the statement is read. [read, extends last issue's "one meeting behind" framing]

None of this amounts to a reopening of the strait. Hormuz's own counters (Board) still show transit running at a fraction of the pre-crisis baseline and a war-risk premium that hasn't moved in nearly a month; a deal that adds one bilateral corridor while a ship takes an unidentified-projectile hit hours beforehand reads as confidence-building alongside an active conflict, not an exit from one. [read/guardrail]

GEOPOLITICS

Russia launched roughly 450 strike drones at Ukraine overnight into Sunday — Ukrainian officials said air defense intercepted 409 of 453 total — alongside eight Kalibr cruise missiles, six Kh-59/69 guided missiles, and Iskander-M/KN-23 ballistic missiles, launched from Orel, Kursk, and Primorsko-Akhtarsk in Russia, occupied Gvardeysk in Crimea, and the Sea of Azov. [NEW] Strikes hit targets across more than a dozen regions including Sumy, Kharkiv, Zaporizhzhia, and Kyiv; missile strikes on two metallurgical plants killed two people and injured six. [fact] No fresher ISW assessment or territorial-change readout for this specific night was located to compare against Friday's 162-drone count, so no like-for-like trend line is offered beyond noting the raw count roughly tripled week-on-week. [flag; comparison caveat]

IRAN & HORMUZ

On the Mecca Joint Defence Agreement, flagged as an open question in Saturday's issue: no fresher Iranian government response to Pakistan's Sept. 9 activation comment was located this run. The only on-record Iranian reaction remains Foreign Ministry spokesman Esmail Baghaei's Aug. 10 line that Tehran had "no reason for concern" over the pact — which predates the Sept. 9 comment by a month and doesn't actually answer it; treat the question as still open, not resolved by an old quote. [continuity, flag: stale] Separately, Iran's own characterization of the Oman deal due Monday — that it would exclude US and Israeli vessels from the new route, per an Aug. 7 report — has not been corroborated by Oman, the US, or any GCC government; if accurate, it would make Monday's signing a narrower document than a generic "Gulf-Iran shipping deal" headline suggests. [flag: single-sourced, Iran's own characterization]

Weekend edition. Calendar/Metrics condensed; Politics, Economics, Business, and Technology cut — nothing new moved in any of them beyond what's already in Saturday's issue (the Navier-Stokes dispute, the Oracle/Adobe earnings reversals, and the AI-funding items are all unchanged and not repeated); Sports to two lines/team.

Continuity. Dropped as unchanged since Saturday: Houthi control of Yemen's Red Sea coast (Mokha/Perim, no new movement); Nvidia-Hugging Face deal terms; Amazon FTC ad-auction suit; Ford/CATL battery scrutiny; Anthropic IPO timeline; Positron AI/Sakana/DeepSeek model news. Watch: whether Monday's Oman signing actually occurs as described and how Globex prices it at the reopen; Wednesday's FOMC decision and statement language; the 30-year yield and the gold/Nikkei figures flagged above, none reconciled across sources this run; any claim of responsibility for Sunday's Qeshm strike; a fresher Iranian response, if any, to Pakistan's Sept. 9 Mecca-pact activation comment.
