The 6:15

MONDAY · NOVEMBER 9, 2026 NO. 38

THE BOARD

CALENDAR — NEXT 10 DAYS

Mon 11/9 (today)	Veterans Day observed — bond market closed; equities trade a full session.
Tue 11/10	October CPI, 8:30a ET. TD Securities (single source) sees headline +0.30% m/m, core +0.21% m/m [flag, single-sourced]. CoreWeave reports Q3 after close.
Wed 11/12	Cisco Systems, Applied Materials report after close [flag, single-sourced]
Fri 11/13	October PPI, 8:30a ET
Mon 11/17	Bednar's deadline to accept/decline Yankees' $23.15M qualifying offer

No FOMC in this window (Fed holds 3.50%–3.75%; next decision Dec. 9). OPEC+'s Nov. 29 meeting falls outside this window — Nov. and Dec. output both already left unchanged at a combined 31.01M b/d. No rocket launch, frontier AI release, or VC round cleared verification this run — AI-release trackers checked were low-authority and contradicted each other [flag].

METRICS · AS OF FRIDAY 11/6 CLOSE (WEEKEND; MON. PRE-MARKET NOT CONFIRMED)

Equities	S&P 500 7,376.86 (+0.31%); Nasdaq Comp. 24,579.42 (+1.09%); Dow 51,285.73 (−0.46%). Week: S&P −2.7%, Nasdaq −3.4%, Dow −0.9%
Thu. rout, for ref.	Dow −1,833.06 (−3.44%); S&P −4.36%; Nasdaq −5.52%; ~$3T mkt cap erased
Brent / WTI	$98.32 (+$0.03) / $90.83 (+$0.31), Fri. settle — spread ~$7.49 (resolves No. 37's flag)
10Y / 2Y / 30Y	10Y ~4.86% Fri. (+~2bp day, −~7bp wk); 2Y/30Y not confirmed [flag]; Treasury closed today
VIX	25.64 (−9.01%) Fri., after Thu.'s +69.7% spike to 28.18
Gold	Dec. futures settled $4,074.90 (−0.94%), Fri.

DXY / Asia / Europe	Not independently confirmed this run [flag]
Retail gas (AAA)	Last confirmed $4.2661/gal (10/27); Nov. figure not confirmed [flag]

Equities/VIX: CNBC. Oil: ICE/NYMEX settles. Rates: Treasury/CME. Gold: CME Dec. futures.

HORMUZ COUNTERS — LAST CONFIRMED NOV. 1–8; STRAITS.LIVE LIVE TRACKER DID NOT RETURN THIS RUN

IRGC claim, Sun. 11/8	Three tankers "caught fire"/exploded, unauthorized route, mines — 3rd near-identical claim in 11 days (also 10/29–30, 11/3) [DEVELOPING]
UKMTO, separately	Tanker fire off Khasab, Oman, reported 11/7 — cause not verified by UKMTO [NEW, single-sourced]
Transits	1 vessel, 11/1 (IMF PortWatch) vs. 85/day baseline — 8 days stale
Dark tankers (24h)	86/160 screened, 53.8% as of 11/4 — not refreshed this run
Lloyd's List traffic	~20% of pre-war levels, per reporting found this run — different measure, see note [flag]
War-risk premium	~32.0x pre-crisis — Oct. 7 estimate, 33 days stale

IRGC claims (Iranian state media), UKMTO advisories, IMF PortWatch's lagged transit count, Lloyd's List's traffic estimate, and straits.live's dark-tanker screen measure different things on different cadences — never averaged or differenced here.

TRANSACTIONS

Yankees	Bednar's $23.15M QO decision due 11/17; not yet made
Knicks / Northwestern	No reported moves this period — games only, see Sports

LEAD

MARKETS

Friday's numbers settle the argument over last week's rout — Brent $98.32, WTI $90.83, the 10-year near 4.86% — and hand the week's real test to Tuesday's CPI print

Monday opens on a market that spent the weekend digesting, not moving. Thursday's AI-capex panic — a $3 trillion, 3.4%-to-5.5% single-session drop across the Dow, S&P 500 and Nasdaq, the worst day for US equities since April 2025 — and Friday's partial recovery on a blowout October jobs report are now fully reconciled in the official tape: the S&P 500 closed the week at 7,376.86, the Nasdaq Composite at 24,579.42, the Dow at 51,285.73, with the index down 2.7%, down 3.4% to 5.5% (sources vary by measurement window) and down 0.9% respectively for the five sessions. The VIX, which spiked as much as 70% intraday Thursday before settling up 69.7% to 28.18, retraced most of that move Friday, closing at 25.64 — still nearly double its pre-Thursday level, a sign options markets are still pricing elevated near-term risk even as the index-level panic has passed. Crude and rates, both flagged unresolved in Sunday's issue because of conflicting source data, now have clean Friday settles: ICE Brent at $98.32, up a token three cents on the day; NYMEX WTI at $90.83, up 31 cents; the 10-year Treasury yield near 4.86%, up roughly 2 basis points on the day but down about 7 on the week.

The read worth sitting with on a quiet Monday: none of Friday's confirmed levels suggest the market treated Thursday as a fundamentals event. Oil barely moved on a day when equities were recovering from their worst session in 19 months — if Thursday's selloff had reflected a genuine growth scare, crude would typically have fallen alongside stocks, not held flat. Instead, Thursday looks increasingly like what this brief called it Sunday: a positioning unwind concentrated in AI-capex-adjacent names (chips, memory, neoclouds) that got flushed hard and then found buyers the next day once October's payrolls — +165,000 against a consensus clustered near 59,000–70,000, unemployment down to 4.1% — gave index-level investors a reason to step back in. That framing makes Tuesday's October CPI print, due 8:30 a.m. ET, the week's actual test rather than a recap of last week. A single forecaster checked this run, TD Securities, expects headline CPI to cool to 0.30% month-over-month from September's 0.65%, with core at 0.21% — a deceleration, if it holds, but still consistent with year-over-year inflation running at 3.6%–3.7%, well above the Fed's 2% target and with no FOMC meeting until Dec. 9 to react to it either way [single-sourced]. A cooler-than-expected print would reinforce Friday's soft-landing read — strong jobs, falling inflation — and could extend the relief rally into the chip and neocloud names that led Thursday's drop; a hotter print reopens the harder question of whether the Fed can keep cutting into an economy still adding jobs at Friday's pace without reigniting the inflation argument markets had, until Thursday, mostly stopped pricing.

The one genuine overnight development is geopolitical, and it argues the same disconnect runs through the oil market specifically: Iran's Revolutionary Guard Navy claimed Sunday that three tankers caught fire or exploded in the Strait of Hormuz after entering what it called an unauthorized route, blaming naval mines and disabled navigation systems — a claim that is, in substance and almost word-for-word in phrasing, the third iteration in eleven days of an assertion first made Oct. 29–30 and repeated Nov. 3, with no vessel names, flags or casualties disclosed in any of the three instances and none independently verified by UKMTO or any other named tracker [single-sourced to Iranian state media]. That Brent moved three cents on a day its front month also carried this claim is itself informative: traders are treating the IRGC's repeated, unverifiable tanker claims as noise rather than confirmed supply disruption, consistent with how this brief's Hormuz counters have read for weeks — elevated crisis indices and a near-closed strait by transit count, but a market that has stopped reacting to each new claim on its own.

Breadth is the other thing worth watching into Monday's open, even without a fresh print to confirm it: Thursday's drop was concentrated in a specific cluster — Nvidia down roughly 9%, Micron and AMD both down more than 15% intraday before paring losses, the Philadelphia Semiconductor Index off 12%, and neocloud names Nebius, Iren and CoreWeave each down double digits — rather than broad-based across the index, and Friday's rebound in the same names (Nvidia, AMD and Intel each recovering in the high-single to high-single-digit percentage range) tracked that same narrow list. A market moving on CPI Tuesday in the same narrow cluster that moved Thursday and Friday would support the positioning-unwind read; a move that broadens out to the rest of the index either way would suggest something closer to a genuine repricing of growth or inflation expectations is underway.

Watch: Tuesday's CPI as the week's real catalyst; whether Monday's quiet session holds or gives way to continued unwind in the chip and neocloud names Thursday hit hardest; and whether UKMTO or another independent tracker ever corroborates any of the IRGC's three tanker claims, which would change the risk calculus for crude considerably if it happened.

POLITICS

Ohio's governor's race, flagged uncalled in issue No. 36, is resolved: the AP called it for Democrat Amy Acton over Republican Vivek Ramaswamy on election night, Nov. 3, at 10:49 p.m. — Acton becomes the state's first woman elected governor [resolves flag]. The call lands inside the broader Nov. 3 result this brief has already reported: Democrats took unified control of the House and Senate, flipping seven Senate seats, with Hakeem Jeffries positioned as the first Black speaker once the new Congress is seated. Kansas remains uncalled: as of Nov. 8, with roughly 99% of votes counted, Republican Ty Masterson leads Democrat Cindy Holscher in a race pre-election polling had pegged as close (an Oct. 27 polling average had Masterson at 48.4%, Holscher at 44.2%). The House Democratic caucus's internal leadership vote, cited in issue No. 37 as scheduled for Nov. 18, could not be independently reconfirmed this run [flag] — regardless of that date, the binding floor vote that actually elects a speaker still waits for the new Congress to convene Jan. 3, 2027, requiring 218 votes.

ECONOMICS

Beyond the Lead: October CPI (Tue., 8:30a ET) is this week's only first-tier print, with October PPI following Friday. Both releases sit inside a compressed data calendar still catching up from the earlier-year shutdown delay that pushed October's jobs report into this month, which means the usual spacing between releases is compressed too — PPI, normally a few days removed from CPI, lands just three days later this cycle. TD Securities' single-sourced forecast — headline +0.30% m/m, core +0.21% m/m, both decelerating from September's +0.65% headline pace — was the only October CPI preview this run's research turned up; no multi-bank survey or Dow Jones consensus figure could be independently confirmed, so treat the forecast as directional rather than a market consensus [single-sourced]. One data point search found but could not corroborate from a second source: September's CPI print itself is cited at 3.7% year-over-year against a 3.6% forecast in one feed and at a 2.6% core rate against a 2.5% forecast in another — the two numbers describe different CPI measures (headline vs. core) rather than conflicting, but neither was independently confirmed against the BLS release itself this run [not confirmed against BLS].

BUSINESS

Earnings worth flagging ahead of Tuesday and Wednesday: CoreWeave, one of the neocloud names that fell double digits intraday in Thursday's selloff before paring losses, reports Q3 results Tuesday after the close — the first hard data point on AI-infrastructure revenue and cash burn since the market repriced capex-payback risk. The comparison investors will be working from: Iren, a similar AI-infrastructure/data-center operator that reported last week, posted roughly $200 million in AI-related revenue against a $263 million quarterly loss — a concrete illustration of the revenue-versus-cash-burn gap Thursday's selloff was repricing across the sector, and the bar CoreWeave's own print will be read against. Cisco Systems and Applied Materials both report Wednesday after the close [single-sourced]; Applied Materials in particular is a direct bellwether for semiconductor-equipment capital spending, the same spending investors were discounting Thursday. No other S&P 500 earnings this week were independently confirmed from more than one source this run.

TECHNOLOGY

Anthropic's IPO timeline, re-checked this run, still doesn't resolve: the company confidentially filed with the SEC in early June following a $65 billion funding round that valued it at roughly $965 billion; reporting from mid-to-late August described bankers telling investors an October listing could raise $100 billion-plus at a target valuation near $2 trillion. That October window has now passed with no confirmation this run that pricing or a public listing actually occurred, and issue No. 37's single-sourced figure putting the expected valuation at $1-1.3 trillion could not be re-found or corroborated this run, so it is not repeated [stale, unconfirmed]. Separately, several AI-model-release trackers checked this run disagreed sharply on what, if anything, shipped in November — claims ranged from a single open-weights release to a contested "GPT-6"-branded item — and none met this brief's bar for a named, corroborated primary source, so nothing is reported here [not corroborated].

GEOPOLITICS

No standalone development beyond the Lead and Iran & Hormuz sections this issue — Friday's rebound and the IRGC's Sunday tanker claim are this week's whole story so far.

IRAN & HORMUZ

See the Lead for this run's central Hormuz development — the IRGC's Sunday claim of three tankers hit by mines on an "unauthorized route," the third near-identical iteration of that claim in eleven days (Oct. 29–30, Nov. 3, Nov. 8), with no ship identities, flags or casualties confirmed in any instance and no independent corroboration from UKMTO or another named tracker. Separately, UKMTO logged a tanker fire off Khasab, Oman, reported Nov. 7 — a day before the IRGC's claim and, on the available reporting, a distinct incident; UKMTO itself has not verified the fire's cause [single-sourced]. Lloyd's List Intelligence reporting found this run puts overall strait traffic near 20% of pre-war levels; Lloyd's List has separately put the pre-war baseline near 120–130 vessels a day, which would put current traffic in the mid-20s per day if that baseline and percentage share a denominator — a calculation this brief flags rather than performs, since the two figures came from different reports this run [not independently reconciled]. That 20% estimate cannot be reconciled with either the IMF PortWatch transit count (1 vessel Nov. 1 against an 85/day baseline) or straits.live's dark-tanker screen (53.8% as of Nov. 4) because all three track different things on different cadences — see the Board's methodology note. The strait has now been closed to ordinary commercial shipping since Feb. 28, with intermittent, contested reopening efforts in the months since. The Qatar/Pakistan-mediated reopening framework shows no dated update this run; sticking points remain unchanged from mid-October (sanctions relief, frozen-asset release, an end to attacks as the price of reopening shipping).

SPORTS

Yankees	Season over (ALDS). Bednar's $23.15M QO decision due 11/17, not yet made.
Knicks	Off since Sat.'s 109-97 road win over Cleveland (Brunson 31, Towns 29); now 5-4. Next: Tue. vs. Milwaukee (MSG).
Northwestern	Off since Sat.'s 24-10 home loss to No. 21 Iowa; now 3-7. Next: Sat. 11/14 at Ohio State.

Continuity. Resolved this issue: Friday's Brent/WTI settles and 10-year yield (flagged conflicting in issue No. 37); Ohio's governor race (flagged uncalled in issue No. 36). Still open: Kansas governor race; the Nov. 18 House Democratic leadership-vote date (unconfirmed this run); Anthropic's IPO status past its reported October target; whether UKMTO or any independent tracker ever corroborates the IRGC's three near-identical tanker claims. Watch for next issue: Tuesday's CPI and the market's reaction in chip/neocloud names specifically; CoreWeave's Tuesday earnings; Cisco/Applied Materials Wednesday; the Bednar decision (due 11/17); whether Monday's quiet session was a genuine pause or a lull before continued unwind.

Unverified figures are marked in red: Monday pre-market/futures levels for equities, oil and rates; DXY, 2Y/30Y yields, and Asia/Europe closes; November retail gas; a multi-bank consensus for October CPI (only a single-sourced TD Securities forecast found); the Nov. 18 House Democratic leadership-vote date; Anthropic's IPO valuation and listing status; November AI-model-release claims. Nothing was estimated or filled from memory.